Artistic Practice

Acrylic painting practice rooted in fear, dark emotion, and internal imagery. Visual language developed through analog photographic processes translated into paint: tonal fragmentation, simulated grain, and controlled image degradation. Work drawn from horror, folklore, and occult visual traditions.

Technical Background

Analog film photography (foundation); Darkroom printing processes (conceptual and technical influence); Application of photographic structures and exposure logic within acrylic painting.

Louis Andrada – Description of Practice

Since I was a kid, I have been drawn to fear. Not as spectacle but as the most honest feeling I know. Horror, folklore, occult imagery were never escapes for me, they were the only places that told the truth about what living inside my own head actually felt like. That is where this practice comes from.

My technical foundation is in analog film photography and darkroom production. That training established how I think about images, in grain, tonal contrast, chemical disruption, forms that develop slowly and resist full resolution. I do not produce photographs anymore but those processes live inside how I paint. Surfaces are built through sequential acrylic layering that simulates exposure, degradation, and controlled deterioration. Figures emerge gradually, caught between visibility and collapse.

Painting functions as containment for me. Internal images tied to fear, unease, and disturbance would otherwise stay formless and intrusive. The canvas fixes them into a physical state and holds them there. Each work is less an invention than an extraction, taking what already exists internally and forcing it into visibility.

Works are wall-mounted acrylics on canvas, developed across multiple sessions with controlled drying between layers. Scale varies. No complex installation requirements.
